Financial Aid for Single Parents

You would probably think that as a single parent, you could do what has to be done all on your own. You feel that you have what it takes to be a good single parent.

Hopefully, you are not one of those who assume that they are in the lineage of super heroes, handling every weight on their shoulders. You would get yourself busy on all sides with the different activities that can show your kids that you, as a new family, can handle it on your own.

But has it ever occurred to you that it might not be all about your relationship with your kids? Yes it is primarily about that, but can you do so without financial help?

Financial complications usually come up when households of single parents try to have college education covered. This is where you realize that you need aid after all, financial aid.

There are certain policies in having financial aid determined for single parents, like you if ever you are one, that are deemed to be highly confusing at times. This article would gladly give you an overview of the process.

In case you do not know, the custodial parent is the one with whom the child, specifically a student, has lived the most in the span of the twelve months that have already passed.

If the student admits that he or she did not live with a certain parent more than the other parent, then his or her parent who has provided most of the financial support in the past twelve months will be the one to fill out FAFSA.

Another situation would be if the student got to live with each of his or her parents with the equal amount of time and also if the parents provided an equal level of assistance, in terms of finances, then the parent who will claim the student for purposes of income tax should be the one to do the filling out of the FAFSA.

You must never forget that any child support or any alimony that has been received from a non-custodial parent must always be included on the FAFSA.

It might be a bit too late to say this, since this article has been mentioning it for quite some time now. FAFSA actually is an acronym for Free Application for Federal Student Aid. Now you know, so you can stop creasing your forehead in wonder every time you read the acronym FAFSA.

The federal government does not put the income or the assets of a non-custodial parent to consideration, especially when the student's financial need is being determined.

Just in case you do not know, many private colleges take into account the assets and income of the non-custodial parent, even if he or she does not want to be included in contributing to college costs.

These said colleges would ask for a supplemental financial aid form from a non-custodial parent. This said financial aid form does a whole lot in affecting the awarding of the aid of the school, however, it is neither federal nor state.

Still, there are special cases wherein a number of private colleges will waive the requirements for non-custodial information. There is, however, a criterion that has to be met so that a certain single parent household will not be automatically qualified for a waiver.

First, the non-custodial parent should not be found nor located. So this would only make it eventual that that certain parent has not made any form of child support payment recently, and it is also an indication that that parent has not been consistent in his or her child support payments.

Next, if the separation or the divorce has happened in the past of the past, which means it was really a long time ago, then it is highly reasonable to expect a provision from that non-custodial parent.

And lastly, if the said non-custodial parent has a history of neglect or of abuse either with the child or with the other parent.

Court records will be used for documentation for the said criteria. Hopefully, it is now clear to you that the criteria must be documented first so that there will be a waiver for the information regarding the non-custodial parent.

Financial Assistance For Single Parents

Single parents are becoming too popular and widely accepted a concept nowadays. Gone were the days when single parents are left solely and alone to raise their child or children alone.

The Federal Government and all legitimate governments around the world are now recognizing the increasing and growing trend of single parenting.

Single parents, as you might have noticed, are everywhere. The lady sitting beside you in the bus ride home or the sales lady attending to your needs in the grocery might probably be among those single moms that are struggling hard to make both ends meet and raise their child or children single handedly.

Governments are mandated and are expected to care for and give protection to their constituents. Governments do protect their people, and that protection given should never be discriminative.

Thus, single parents should be given equal rights as those who are normal parents or those single individuals.

That is why governments from around the world are following the United States government model for compensating or providing financial assistance to single parents.

The government program that supports or gives financial aid to children and single parents are being adopted and closely watched by all governments all over the world now.

It is always assumed that since single parents take the sole responsibilities of single parenting in raising children, they are financially crunched and striving. The times are really hard nowadays, and earning to raise children can get really tough especially since the society is not so kind to single parents.

Financial assistance given to single parents

In the United States, financial support or assistance to single parents. The government effort is really a major feat. However, not all single parents are fully fitted and eligible for the program.

To be able to attain or receive financial support or aid from the government, single parents should be found positive of fit for the following requirements.

Children of single parents will be subsidized or given financial assistance by the government until they reach 18 years. However, the child's situation is subject to thorough probing.

First, the single parent must be first and foremost divorced. Another case for eligibility for financial assistance is when the other significant parent is already dead, or is seriously injured, handicapped or disabled.

It is assumed that during those cases, parent support to the child is almost too impossible and hopeless. Thus, the government intervene and provides the financial parenting or providing role.

Another case for eligibility for single parenthood financial assistance is when the other parent has abandoned the child for about or more than a year already. It is because during the span can it be rightly asserted and assumed that there exists abandonment.

Imprisonment of the other parent can also be grounds or causes for financial support. Or if the child has been born while the parents are not legally tied or married, in other words, the child is born obviously and apparently out of wedlock.

Another desperate case is when the other parent is not identified, which is a case rapidly rising nowadays.

Children and single parents with the following situations, take note, are not eligible for filing or seeking financial assistance or support from the government.

- The child is a rightful heir for any property or pension due to the single parent or both parents.
- The single parent receives or attains additional disability pension funds either because of his disability or because he has children.
- The child is under the custody of foster parents or he or she is under the custody of a daycare center.
- If the child is currently raised and supported by the single parent's domestic or current partner. Partners bounded by common-law marriages are covered by this provision.
- The single parent is also eligible to receive or be granted public pension benefits.

Thus, filing for financial assistance or support among single parents would not be that easy. Be reminded that such stringent requirements are established to avoid fraud and anomalous activities by bad people who will take on or abuse single parenthood to illegally attain benefits and funds.

Government's Financial Help for Single Parents

It is good to note that governments around the world are now recognizing the value and nobility of single parenting.

Single parenting is basically a courageous choice and decision that one without enough courage and bravery is ready to deal with. Experts noted that single parents, almost all of them, had been given the choice or option whether they would get on with the life or not. But they still decided to take on the role against all odds.

Single parents could have killed the child during pregnancy through abortion, but they had the greater guts and conscience not to do that, which is really commendable.

The Catholic Church and Rome is advising its people and believers to avoid or prevent the occasions of sins that could lead to single parenthood. But once a person becomes a single parent, the Church is all out on its moral and spiritual support.

If given the chance, according to one social poll, majority of the population in the United States would not resort to being a single parent. Single parenthood, therefore, is a choice, not a random destiny given to anyone.

Financial help for single parents

Financial help or aid is given by the government to any single parent who obviously and direly need financial support. The law recognizes the very hard and very imposing responsibility single parents assume and take, that is why financial help is extended to single parents.

In that way, the hardships and pressures experienced by single parents are purposely and somehow reduced and alleviated, if not totally eliminated. The morale of the single parent in continually raising the child is also boosted.

Seeking financial help

For single parents seeking financial help or support from the government, here are ways and procedures on how to finally secure that much needed financial help or support. To process an application if a single parent seeks financial or money help or support for single parenting, he or she must obtain a form freely available from the local or nearest City Hall.

The application for financial help forms should be honestly and clearly filled out because the information will have to be verified and will form the basis for approving the financial aid application. No more padding or unnecessary tarnishing of information. Remember, the more honest you become, the better would be the outcome.

Be advised that while financial help and aid for single parents are available and open to every single parent in the land, qualifications and eligibilities do exist and are set to protect the funds from abusive and money greedy people. Not all single parents are qualified for that, but believe it or not, the provisions are really bright and necessary.

Take note that financial help and money aids for single parents will not be given to single parents whose salaries and compensation is very huge and more than enough to comfortably and even luxuriously support the child or children. That would be too unfair to those who are basically and already deprived of basic and comfortable living.

Who is eligible for financial help?

To qualify for the financial help or assistance provided by the government to single parents, the single parent, above all must be first and foremost divorced.

Another case for eligibility for financial assistance is when the other significant parent, mom or dad, is already dead, or is seriously injured, disabled or handicapped.

Other eligibility requirements basically require the financial help applicant to prove that the financial help or support is really and badly needed by the single parent and the child.

A single parent is very much qualified for financial help if his or her partner is imprisoned regardless of the case that made him or her partially incapable to provide finances and full financial support to the child.

Or if the child has been born while the parents are not legally tied or married, in other words, the child is born obviously and apparently out of wedlock.

Government Assistance For Single Parents

Being a single parent is a tough job. Imagine you should be a mom and a dad all at the same time. This means that you will be nurturer as well as a provider. Tough, isn't it? But don't you worry. There are government assistance for single parents to help you do these two arduous parenting jobs.

If you are a mom, being a nurturer comes naturally. There poses a problem if you are a dad. There is government assistance for single parents to help a father develop his 'maternal' skills. There are support groups available that will guide single parents on the basics of child rearing.

There is also available government assistance for single parents who are jobless. Single moms, particularly, have a problem with this. Their being a mother always comes first and oftentimes lose their jobs in the process. When they are employed, they lose focus with their jobs and thus become perpetually late and absent to tend to a sick child or attend a parent-teacher meeting in school.

There is government assistance for single parents with this kind of problem. All a single mom should do is go to the nearest local government office and ask for a job that aptly fits a single mother. Yes, there are jobs that are 'single parents' friendly. The local government collect all the businesses within the county that have 'special considerations' for single parents.

If any of these 'single parents friendly' companies hire you, don't ever think that you have the liberty to be absent whenever you want to. Of course, your being absent or late should have a valid reason. Otherwise, you will also end up fired for abuse of confidence.

Aside from these, there are still lots of government assistance for single parents. This includes monthly stipend if you are jobless which you can apply at your nearest local office. Within a specified time, of course, you should have found a job.

The local government will assist you in finding a job. In a month or so, if you seek for government assistance for single parents, you will undoubtedly find a job that suits your needs and understands your special situation.

Also there is a government assistance program for single parents who want to go back to school or enroll in college. State universities and private colleges offer scholarships for single parents. You could ask your local government office about this.

They have a list of schools that offer such scholarship. Aside from the scholarship, you may also get or be awarded a monthly stipend to finance your daily school work needs and some for your household. This is of course while you are at school. The moment you finish school, the issuance of monthly stipend will be stopped.

Why is the federal government doing all these assistance for single parents? The Federal Government values the sanctity and importance of a family. Today, being a family doesn't mean a household must have a father and mother before it will be called as such. As long as there is a single parent who is maintaining the happiness and peace in a household, that home deserves to be called a family.

So, in order for single parents to give a bright future to their child or children the federal government extends assistance to single parents. They help single parents reach their dreams for their children, feed them properly, bring them to school for education, and nurture their emotional and spiritual needs to be a good person and citizen when they grow up.

Some single parents are hesitant or even stubborn to seek for assistance being offered by the local government. Don't be. Do not deny your children of what they deserve just because you are too stubborn to admit that you need help.

Besides, the help that you will get from the local government comes from our taxes, and your taxes that you have paid and paying too, taxes that all of us citizens have religiously paid with our efforts and sweat. By seeking help, you are merely reaping what you funded in the Federal Government's tax fund.

Government Aids for Single Parents in the US

The number of single parents is rapidly increasing and growing not just in the United States, but also in other countries.

Raising a child or children alone and solely is never an easy and comfortable task. That is why single parenting is a very hard and arduous job and responsibility that only the strong willed, courageous and responsible people choose or opt to take.

If given the chance, according to one social poll, majority of the population in the United States would not resort to being a single parent. Single parenthood, therefore, is a choice, not a random destiny given to anyone.

Financial assistance for single parents

Financial support is given by the government to any single parent who obviously and direly needs financial support. The law recognizes the hard and very imposing responsibility single parents have, that is why financial aids are given to single parents. In that way, the hardships and pressures experienced by single parents are somehow reduced and alleviated.

Government grants for single parents are accessible to the general public, especially the needy single parents.

To process an application if a single parent seeks financial or money support for single parenting, he or she must obtain a form from the local or nearest City Hall. The forms should be honestly and clearly filled out because the information will have to be verified and will form the basis for approving the financial aid application.

For single parents, be advised that while financial aids for single parents are available and open to every single parent in the land, qualifications and eligibilities do exist and are set to protect the funds from abusive and money greedy people.

Take note that financial aids will not be given to single parents whose salaries and compensation is very huge and more than enough to comfortably and even luxuriously support the child or children.

Eligibility

To qualify for the financial assistance provided by the government to single parents, the single parent, above all must be first and foremost divorced. Another case for eligibility for financial assistance is when the other significant parent, mom or dad, is already dead, or is seriously injured, disabled or handicapped.

Experts and the government assume that during those cases, parent support to the child in terms of the financial aspect is almost too impossible and hopeless. Thus, the government intervenes and provides the financial parenting or providing role.

Another case for eligibility for single parenthood financial assistance is when the other parent has abandoned the child for about or more than a year already. It is because during the said span of time, or time frame, can it be rightly asserted and assumed that there exists abandonment.

Imprisonment of the other parent can also be grounds or causes for financial support. Or if the child has been born while the parents are not legally tied or married, in other words, the child is born obviously and apparently out of wedlock.

Children and single parents with the following situations, take note, are not eligible for filing or seeking financial assistance or support from the government.

- The child is a rightful heir for any property or pension due to the single parent or both parents.
- The single parent receives or attains additional disability pension funds either because of his disability or because he has children.
- The child is under the custody of foster parents or he or she is under the custody of a daycare center.
- If the child is currently raised and supported by the single parent's domestic or current partner. Partners bonded by common-law marriages are covered by this provision.
- The single parent is also eligible to receive or be granted public pension benefits.

Financial aid may be provided to the single parents. In turn, single parents must first and foremost realize that single parenting not only involves the financial aspect but above all, the caring and emotional support only they can give is far more great, noble and essential than the financial assistance extended to single parents by the government.

Government Assistance and Grants For Single Parents

The US government offers financial support for single parents who have proven themselves unable to provide enough care for their children. The law acknowledges that single parents face responsibilities that are much more complicated than families with two parents, hence the provision for financial assistance. This way, the government takes part in reducing the pressures and hardships single parents face every single day.

Single parents are growing in number throughout the country and all over the world. In fact, with the rising trend toward woman empowerment, more females are opting to raise kids on their own than getting married (but that's a different story).

Despite the absence of a partner, single parents are not alone in the challenging task of rearing their kids. The government is there and very much willing to help.

All single parents qualify for government assistance, particularly those who are in dire need of financial help. To apply for aid, the single parent must first secure and fill up a form from the city hall. Information sought on the forms should be honestly and completely filled out because these will determine his or her eligibility for the assistance being offered.

Yes, while all single parents are eligible for government help, there still are certain guidelines that need to be fulfilled to protect the fund from unscrupulous people. Also, keep in mind that financial assistance will only be given to those single parents who truly need them, and not to those who earn hefty salaries.

Single parents that may avail of government financial help are those that have been divorced, or if the other parent is either handicapped, seriously injured, or deceased.

If the other parent is imprisoned, the custodial parent may also apply for government support. It can also cover those whose children had been born out of marriage, or if the other parent has not been identified.

In addition, it also applies to those single-parent families where the other parent has abandoned them for about a year. The time frame is given, because, under law, it is only until then that abandonment can be officially and legally claimed.

Here are some of the grants offered for single parents:

- state child care subsidies
- low income home energy assistance program (LIHEAP)
- women, infant & children's program (WIC)
- temporary assistance to needy families (TANF)

The following single parent situations will exclude the applicant from obtaining government sponsored financial assistance:

- if the child is being supported by the single parent's partner

- if the single parent is already receiving pensions for his or her disability or for other reasons
- if the child is being cared for by foster parents
- if the child is waiting to claim an inheritance from one or both of his or her parents

However, even if the government offers assistance, single parents should not simply rely on these to care for their kids. As a single parent, you must be responsible and resilient enough to seek ways to finance your and your child's well being without having to apply for help. Go get a job, who cares if it's temporary? The important thing is you're exercising all the effort and energy to provide the best you can for your child.

Mortgage for Single Parents: Housing Options For Single Parents

Being a single parent has a lot of responsibilities. These include food, transportation, healthcare, insurance payments, and mortgage payments.

The government mandated child-support payments take care of majority of these, but single parents still have to make the monthly necessary payments to pay these items. These payments usually range from $4000-6000 per year.

From combined incomes, the single parent needs to support the family through of her income. This is exacerbated when the partner does not contribute to the expenses. One needs to take on additional jobs to be able to address the growing expenses of the family.

This leads to feelings of not having control over one's life and a feeling of helplessness. Being financially independent is the biggest challenge of single parents to date. Being debt-free is a big factor in happiness among single parents. One of the most popular debts of single parents is the mortgage.

The mortgage of single parents has significantly increased over the past twenty years. A recent study conducted in Britain stated the debt difference between a home-owning single parents and single parents who rented apartments.

Findings showed that the debt of single parent homeowners are at 13% while single parents who rented apartments was at 25%. Either way, the study shows that single parents are struggling with mortgage payments. Several alternatives, such as moving to a complex to lower payments or living with other single parents have been done, however, does minimal, or no help in the mortgage payments.

One way of securing financial independence, in terms of mortgage payments for single parents, is having a strong income power. The single parent needs to analyze his finances to be able to figure out what works in terms of the mortgage payments. Sometimes, the single parent realizes that he/she needs to take on additional jobs in order to support the mortgage payments.

In choosing the right mortgage for single parents, one needs to think about the following, current financial standing, dynamics of changing finances, how long one intends to keep the house, and the change of mortgage payments.

One needs to take into consideration fixed mortgage rather than yearly mortgage and refinancing for example. The bank also reviews one's credit limit, when the single parent applies for this.

For easier Loan approvals, iHomeMortgage.com recommends to follow the following:

Single Parents in College

To date, experts estimate that there are two out of ten college students, regardless of gender, that are single parents by choice or by chance.

The estimate looks not alarming, but the thing is that experts believe and assert that the number of single parents in college is constantly and rapidly rising. With the advent of rising and more popular liberated principles adopted by the modern generation, single parenthood is not a taboo anymore.

In the United States alone, it is estimated that more and more single parents are emerging and the number is consistently rising as time goes by. Single parenthood is becoming a popular life style among adults.

What is more concerning is the obvious and logical fact that because teenage pregnancies and unwanted pregnancies are occurring in the country, the young people are bugged and burdened by the single parenthood.

The alarming situation has prompted the rise and proliferation of single parenthood issues, not just in the United States, but in the whole world.

There are more and more single parents enrolled in college nowadays. Single parents enrolled in college are becoming a concern for parents, people and the government moreover.

Single parents and the challenges

For single parents enrolled in college, the situation is really a cause for alarm. That is because college life is generally not an easy life. With the time constraints and the issues arising from academic performance and requirements, college students who are also single parents are subjected to many and different forms of pressure.

For one, the pressure brought about by the society on single parents enrolled in college are pressuring above all. Single parenting in those situations is becoming more of a burden or some sort of punishment.

Society views single parents as uncaring and wild spirited individuals who do not care to take precautions before finally giving in to the pleasures of sex. With the popularity and drive against pregnancies and STDs through contraceptives, it is logical to assert that single parents in college were not adequately oriented to the benefits of responsible sex.

Thus, single parents in college are perceived by colleagues and classmates as promiscuous and sex-starved individuals. It is a stigma not unique to single parents enrolled in college. Single parents in general strive to prove people wrong about the notion.

It is the first and basic dilemma among single parents enrolled in college.
